Tick Paralysis in Pets

What is tick paralysis?

Tick paralysis is a potentially deadly condition caused by the Paralysis Tick (Ixodes holocyclus) parasite, that can affect dogs and cats.

When and where can ticks be found?

The Paralysis Tick can be found in bushy coastal areas along the eastern seaboard of Australia, from north Queensland to eastern Victoria (image right). Many people assume that ticks are only present during summer months, but the high risk period can span from spring and autumn, with cases regularly reported in winter.

Paralysis ticks will jump onto dogs and cats and then attach by burrowing their mouth-parts into the skin. Although they prefer to attach to the front half of the dog or cat, they can attach anywhere, even in the ears, on the lips, or around the anus. Dogs and cats can have multiple ticks attached at once. Occasionally, numerous tiny juvenile ticks can attach simultaneously causing an intense maddening itch.

How long does a tick have to attach for before it causes a problem?

As a general rule, for a tick to cause a problem for dog or cat, it either has to be quite large (greater than 4 mm long) or be attached for at least 4 days. However there can be marked variation in the potency of the tick and also the individual dog or cat's susceptibility to tick paralysis, which may also vary from season to season.

Why are Paralysis Ticks so dangerous?

After attaching, the tick feeds on the host's blood, injecting small amounts of saliva into the dog or cat. The tick's saliva contains a toxin that disrupts the connection between the nerves and the muscles of the body, causing weakness and paralysis. Not only does this affect muscles that help the animal stand and walk, but it can also affect muscles used for breathing and swallowing, leading to serious and life threatening conditions.

If ticks are attached near the eyes they can paralyse the eye lid, preventing the animal from blinking, which can cause eyes to dry out and become damaged. Because the tick toxin also causes paralysis of the oesophagus (food pipe), affected dogs and cats may choke, retch, or regurgitate their food, water or just frothy fluid. One serious complication of this is aspiration of fluid or food into the lungs, which causes pneumonia. Tick paralysis also often causes difficulty breathing. If the paralysis becomes too advanced and the muscles involved with breathing become too weak, the dog or cat may not be able to breath sufficiently, or at all.

Tick paralysis is progressive and potentially fatal and mechanical ventilation in a veterinary hospital may be required.

What are common signs of tick paralysis?

- Incoordination
- Weakness
- Collapse
- Vomiting or retching
- Change in sound of bark or meow
- Difficulty breathing

What do Paralysis Ticks look like?

Paralysis Ticks can be identified by their grey body and legs close to the head. Their legs are the feature which best distinguishes them from other ticks that occur in the same regions. Paralysis ticks have one pair of brown legs closest to their head, then two pairs of white legs and then one pair of brown legs closest to the body.

Paralysis Tick

Bush Tick

Brown Dog Tick

The top row shows unfed ticks, in the middle row the ticks are half fed and lastly fully fed, engorged ticks.

How do I prevent tick paralysis?

If your dog or cats lives in, or visits areas where paralysis ticks could be present, you should regularly search them thoroughly, at least once a day. Clipping your dog or cat's coat short, especially during the tick season, makes performing tick searches much easier.

Using commercially available parasiticide products is highly recommended to help prevent a potentially deadly condition. Since the release of modern parasite treatment products (containing the isoxazoline class of drug), there does appear to be a reduction in the number of cases of tick paralysis seen in hospitals such as SASH. This is a positive indication that the products are highly effective. However it is important to note that no product is 100% effective at preventing ticks from attaching and causing paralysis, so regular searches are vital in order to avoid tick paralysis. Products that can help include chewables, spot-on products (applied to the skin), baths, and rinses.

It is vital to use tick prevention products exactly as directed and most importantly, do not to use any products designed for dogs on cats as these can be extremely toxic to cats. Consult with your local veterinarian about the best tick product or program for your pet. Professional advice is especially important because parasite protection involves parasites other than ticks, and a program of multiple products may be required depending on your pet's situation.

How do I perform a tick search?

To perform a tick search, work your fingers through your dog or cat's coat down to the skin and then systematically massage your fingers over the entire coat. You should concentrate on the dog or cat's front half as this is where ticks are more likely to attach. Once firmly attached, ticks feel like a hard, smooth, round irregularity on the surface of the skin. Make sure you check the edge of the lips, in skin folds, between the toes and in the ears.

If you think that you have found a tick, part the fur to have a closer look at it. Nipples, warts and other bumps on the skin are often mistaken for ticks and you should not attempt to remove them. Sometimes the tick has already become detached by the time that you are performing a search, in which case you may only find a crater where a tick has been attached.

What do I do after I find a tick on my dog or cat?

If you have found a tick, you should use a tick remover (small device that looks like a bent 2 pronged fork) to detach it from the skin. If a tick remover is not available, tweezers are also suitable. Attempt to remove the tick by its head, without squeezing the body. Great care must be taken not to separate the head from the body. If the tick is too difficult to remove, take your pet to the vet immediately. Do not attempt to burn the tick, apply tick treatments, alcohol, mineral oil or petroleum jelly to the tick while it is still attached. Closely monitor your pet, even if it is well. It is possible for your pet to start showing signs of tick paralysis after the tick is removed. Once signs of paralysis appear, the animal can deteriorate further even after the tick has been removed.

If your pet is showing any signs of tick paralysis, it is considered an emergency, seek veterinary treatment immediately. Do not wait for signs to worsen and do not give food or water before seeking help. This is especially important for animals that are already having trouble swallowing.

Stud Dog Presentation:

Along with the Zap presentation, Jo Cathie presented the Stud dog presentation. It was a fantastic lecture on current stud dogs in Australia with statistics, showcasing bloodlines, virtues and family types.

It was well received by the members that attended with many questions and comments being thrown around. The presentation was very thought out and was full of information. Delivering a lot of information in one possible place. Thanks to Jo for taking the time to present the lecture.

From The Editor

What an October it has been. If you haven't already gone and join the GSDL Facebook and Instagram pages, make sure you do. I am always looking for news and articles to share, so please feel free to send through anything you may find interesting or any results that I can add in the articles.

I would also like to add a stud dog and breeders directory if you would like to be included in this please send through your details.

Regards Jess
